Fines Roughly half of the population of the United States drink alcohol. However, there are some people who are obviously more at risk of severe harm due to alcohol consumption. These individuals are more likely to have alcohol use disorders (AUD) and can experience tremendous negative consequences from their alcohol use. The conditions below describe those characteristics of an AUD. If you think you or someone you know may have an AUD, you are encouraged to seek help. Click on any condition below to learn more information and/or to get assistance.

#2. FASD There is no single cause for FASD. It is primarily a problem of brain development that causes a variety of consequences. This condition includes symptoms that are thought to be due to alcohol exposure, but it can be caused by alcohol use or by a genetic condition. FASD is most likely to affect children who have been exposed to alcohol. FASD occurs when exposure to alcohol during pregnancy has an adverse impact on the fetus. If you have any concerns about whether or not your child is affected by FASD, please contact the Seattle FASD Resource Center. For more information, visit:

#1. Alcohol Use Disorders (AUD) There are many types of AUD that are treatable. There are two distinct types of AUD that are most frequently treated: Alcohol dependence disorder (ADD). An individual meets the DSM-IV criteria for AUD when he or she experiences at least 3 of the following symptoms on a monthly or weekly basis: Craving for alcohol or experiencing withdrawal when drinking is terminated. Not able to control drinking. Experiencing problems with work, school, or social relationships due to alcohol consumption. Mental or physical impairment due to excessive alcohol consumption. Alcohol abuse disorder (AAD). This is a more serious disorder than ADD, and is the second most common type of AUD. An individual with AAD experiences either of the following:
